What data helps us achieve these goals?*

The admissions application process asks questions that are aimed at developing an applicant’s ‘disadvantage weighting’. These include details of the school they attended, their parents’ and grandparents’ level of education, their mother’s home language, and their financial background.

The university uses the computed ‘disadvantage factor’ to weight applicants’ entry-level scores. Applicants will then be placed into three bands from which university selections, or academic offers, will be made.

UCT’s admissions policy balances merit, disadvantage and diversity

Our current admissions policy is located within the contexts of these objectives. Our system for admission is based on five principles:

1. Identifying applicants with the highest potential, recognising that they may not have achieved the highest marks in the National Senior Certificate or National Benchmark Tests due to the quality of their schooling or home environment.

2. Attracting the highest-performing students nationally, regardless of their race or degree of disadvantage.

3. Increasing the number of black and coloured students.

4. Reflecting a wider diversity of social class in first-year classes by increasing first-generation university students, students from poor schools and those from poorer households.

5. Giving admitted students the necessary support to ensure a high probability of graduating.

Demand vs availability of places

- BAND A: Guaranteed offers based on Faculty Points Score (FPS)
- BAND B: Offers based on Weighted Points Score (WPS) [except for the Faculty of Commerce]
- BAND C: Redress offers based on FPS

In 2018 UCT received 31 778 applications from first-time undergraduates for first-year places. There are approximately 4 200 first-year places available at the university each year.
